Mr. Borrromeo joined the session on "Building blue/green skills needed for a safe and sustainable ocean economy," held last November 14, which explores what is needed to understand the industrial and geographical skills that will be required in the future ocean economy; discusses the development of new curricula, methodologies, and skillsets; and initiates a global conversation about the safety skills needed, especially in disadvantaged or informal work settings.

"Our biggest challenge whether it's oceans or any other climate-related problem is getting an awareness of what the key elements are," said Mr. Borrromeo. "Building education and training for the long term so that the skills gap can be limited is very important. As we do that, we hopefully will get better commitment towards the right thinking in order to ensure sustainability."

The session also included Ruth Boumphrey, CEO of the Lloyd's Register Foundation; Daniela Fernandez, CEO of the Sustainable Ocean Alliance; and Essam Mohammed, Managing Director of WorldFish.
